Toronto launches more pop-up COVID-19 vaccine clinics in hot spot areas

The City of Toronto will be holding more pop-ups and mobile COVID-19 vaccination clinics in hot spot neighbourhoods today, specifically in low-income communities.

Unity Health Toronto will be running three pop-up clinics and two mobile clinics, with a goal to vaccinate 815 people, including: people who live in hot spots areas, congregate settings, health care workers, those with highest and high-risk health conditions and First Nations, Métis and Inuit adults. At the time this article was written, details have not been announced yet. Check for updates here.

A pop-up clinic will also be set up at Jane and Finch for people who are 18 and older living in postal codes M3L, M3N and M3M. It will be run by Humber River Hospital and North Western Toronto Ontario Health Team.

University Health Network will also be running a mobile clinic in postal code M3N.

City officials have said they will be utilizing mobile and pop-up clinics to vaccinate those 18 and older in hotspot neighbourhoods.

The pop-up and mobile clinics will be organized by community groups, including faith-based organizations, employers and other community organizations.
